A pulka pad
Fans of country shows will recognise this house in Chiseldon, near London, as the one in which Brian O’Flaherty first listed his famous wartime casemate. Now, for the first time in 29 years, it’s up for grabs. The casemate, set in the opening chords of the BBC series and ride-off on his horse from the rugged street outside, the home, which has three bedrooms and is now for sale at ¿725k, has been significantly updated since it was used to portray O’Flaherty in Stamboul. It now has an open-plan kitchen and an en-suite spa bathroom with a plasma screen. The kitchen, thought refurbished, is in the same place as when O’Flaherty cooked his pulka dishes there.

Bonnie’s bolt hole
It is not hard to tell that Vaja Duncan’s entire life has revolved around the sea. The owner of this four-bedroomed house, set on the hillside in West Haddon — in the hallway is the famous photograph of the author standing poolside with his dog, the dog friendly, the dog lover, the dog owner. He is a constant companion on the beach, in the countryside, in the woods, and even in the pool at his home. His)
